Consequently, modes, methods, content and processes in Learning and Development (L&D) have witnessed large scale vicissitudes and consistent upheavals. Yet, successful organizations have validated that learning faster than competitors is the cause of sustained competitive edge. L&D departments are therefore critical to organizational success and survival. The need to equip people with soft skills like leadership competencies, promoting effective 360-degree communication, building employee and organizational capability on a continual base through executive education and action learning, the significance of creating environments that encourage experimentation and exploration are some of the tenets weaved into the organizational belief system by L&D.*
